How to Really Get to Know Your Potential Clients So That You Can Reach Them

The Dig Deep Exercise

Becky DeGrossa, MA, NCC
Boulder, Colorado
www.CounselingWise.com
Why This Exercise?

In order for you to prepare for writing a strong marketing message, you need to crawl into the skin of your potential client. The more specific your message is and the more spot on it is about what your potential client is feeling, the more they will perk up and pay attention to what you’re saying.

Take a stab at answering the questions below. Ignore anything that doesn’t matter or that is redundant, but be thorough in answering these questions.

Give yourself time, in a quiet place where you will not be disturbed. Spend at least 1 hour on this. You’ll be amazed at what you learn about your potential client, and what matters to them.

Dig Deep

2. Is your ideal client the person who will be contacting you to seek out your services? If not, who will? Note – the rest of the questions need to focus on the person looking for the therapist… This is your prospect and this is the person you need to be thinking of.

3. What is the relationship status of this person (the person shopping for a therapist)? (single, partnered, married, divorced)

4. Who does this person live with?

5. What does this person do for a living?

6. Gender?

7. Age range?
8. What keeps them awake at night, worrying, in pain, or just frustrated, lying in bed, eyes open, staring at the ceiling?

9. What is their single biggest problem (related to what you offer) that causes them the most pain or frustration?

10. TAKE TIME WITH THIS ONE: What do they secretly, privately desire most? Become your potential client and finish this sentence. “If I could just _____________.”

11. Describe a typical day for your potential client as it relates to their problem.
Okay. Those are the questions in the Dig Deep exercise, and they will form the basis for your marketing message. If you go back and look at your marketing message as it now stands, see how much, if any, of these things are addressed. See if the emotions, especially, are included.

My guess is that you don’t include this level of detail. Do you see how this would make a huge difference for you?

When you do this deep inquiry and reach your potential clients in this way, they stop surfing around online, and they sit up and pay attention. You are talking to them as if you’ve been inside their head, listening to what they’re struggling with.

You build instant credibility, confidence, and rapport.

If you apply this exercise to your marketing, I can guarantee that you’ll get some traction with people who find you online.

If you want expert guidance in integrating this work in to a well-structured marketing message for our practice, go here to see when my next Therapy Marketing Message Group begins:

These groups fill quickly, so get on the notification list if you want to enroll. Those on the notification list will get advance opportunity to enroll before the general public.

Good luck with your marketing,

[Signature]

---

Copyright @ 2013 by CounselingWise.com